OVERVIEW OF CASES FROM 2021-2025

Over the course of several years, I experienced a series of deeply disturbing and escalating events that began while I was renting a room from a high school teacher in Seattle during the COVID-19 pandemic. What started as ordinary roommate tensions intensified into prolonged psychological distress, invasive surveillance, and what I believe was targeted harassment using advanced technology.

Alongside this, I was caught in a web of legal complications — protection orders, arrests, court hearings, and forced psychiatric interventions — many of which, in my view, were mishandled, inconsistent, or based on flawed assumptions about my mental state rather than factual evidence. My repeated efforts to report unusual threats, digital intrusions, and suspected misuse of surveillance devices were ignored or dismissed by law enforcement, the courts, and even medical professionals.

Throughout these ordeals, I was subjected to multiple involuntary holds, repeated arrests for alleged violations of orders that I believed had been lifted, and a revolving door of public defenders who often raised questions about my competency instead of investigating my claims. At the same time, I was forcibly medicated, restrained, and at one point physically assaulted while in custody — all without clear justification or adequate due process.

My story is not simply about a single arrest or dispute; it is about what can happen when privacy is violated, when advanced technology is used in harmful ways, and when the legal and mental health systems fail to provide clear, consistent, and just outcomes. I continue to face legal uncertainty, despite never having a full and fair trial to address the allegations against me. My goal now is to bring the facts to light, demand accountability for what I endured, and seek protection from further harm.

SUMMARY

I had been renting a room in a single-family home owned by a high school orchestra teacher who worked north of Seattle. I lived there for nearly three years under a rental agreement. When COVID shut down the schools, my roommate began teaching music classes from home — and that shift completely changed his demeanor. As the months of lockdown dragged on, our relationship deteriorated. The constant proximity and isolation led to arguments that grew increasingly aggressive and controlling. To avoid confrontation, I tried to keep my distance, but that only seemed to make things worse.

Around the same time, the State Auditor's Office suffered a data breach that exposed the personal information of many people receiving pandemic assistance — myself included. I was contacted by the Auditor's Office about the breach, but before I knew anything about it, I had already started having trouble accessing my email account and Google Drive. Then I began receiving strange messages through social media and text — messages from people I didn't know claiming they were watching me, threatening to kill me, even describing in detail what I was wearing. On one occasion, someone contacted me through a friend's profile, leading me to believe it was my friend inviting me over to his house. When I arrived, he was shocked to see me and said he had never sent the message.

Things took an even stranger turn when I started hearing voices taunting and harassing me — they sounded like my neighbors, but we'd never had any issues before, so it didn't make sense. I usually heard them at night or when I was alone in my art studio. They threatened me, harassed me, and made bizarre comments about my family and heritage. I never saw anyone, but I could hear them clearly. It made me feel unsafe and deeply unsettled. I would shout, "Please stop," but the harassment continued. Often I would hear a woman's voice, similar to my neighbor's, saying things like "It's just my goddamn kids," which was completely out of character for them. Over time, the voices seemed to get closer, as if they were right next to me, like wearing headphones turned up to full volume. I began experiencing severe headaches, sharp pains around my ears and jaw, disturbing vibrations, and high-frequency sounds inside my skull, along with obscene voices echoing in my inner ear.

Since the voices sounded like they were coming from the neighbors next door, I decided to go over and check in. I knocked on their door, and a man I had never seen before answered. Just behind him, I saw a woman at a nearby desk — also someone I'd never seen before. I told him I lived next door and was checking in to see if everything was alright. I didn't explain exactly what I was hearing because I wasn't sure where the voices were coming from. He told me everything was fine and quickly closed the door.

A few nights later, I heard a loud scream, like a young girl, quickly covered up by the sound of a blow dryer. I ran outside to see where it was coming from but saw no one — not in the front yard, the backyard, or my neighbor's yard. The next night I decided to call the police and have them to do a wellness check. I was on the front porch of my residence when the police arrived at the house next door. They went and spoke with the people inside then came over to speak with me. I explained that I hadn't seen my neighbors in months and wasn't sure who the couple was now living there. The officers said there was nothing they could do and left. I even called the school the kids next door attended and left a voicemail with my contact information, but I never heard back.

Unable to find the source of the voices and feeling increasingly uneasy about the threatening messages, I began to suspect that maybe my roommate was behind it all. His behavior had grown possessive, and we were arguing almost every day. What made me especially suspicious was the fact that he had ordered unusual AV equipment — things like an electrometer, a switchboard, and other frequency devices to help him teach music classes from home. I had never used this kind of equipment before and seeing it all arrive one day made me feel a little uncomfortable about how it might be used, especially when I started to feel physical pain in and around my head, eyes and ears.

One night, I was hit with a migraine so vicious it felt like a shrieking, high-pitched frequency drilling behind my eyes. Sleep was impossible. Desperate to make it stop, I ran upstairs and found my roommate at his computer, headphones on, surrounded by his equipment. I yelled, "What are you doing?" while frantically trying to switch off dials and controls. He claimed he was just working on assignments for his classes the next day.

As time passed, I became convinced that this equipment was being misused — to spy on me, record me, maybe even harm me physically. The tension between us kept mounting until it snapped into outright abuse. He once barged into the bathroom while I was showering and bit me when I shoved him out and forced the door shut. Another day, someone he knew came over, and when I opened the front door to see who it was, they pulled a knife on me. I called the police multiple times to report the abuse, but they refused to file a report — most precincts in Seattle were shut down because of COVID social distancing.

Somehow, my roommate managed to talk to someone at the sheriff's office and got a protection order filed against me. Meanwhile, none of my own reports ever materialized into anything official. It was infuriating and baffling — and it forced me to pay closer attention to the strange things happening around me: the missing neighbors next door, the cryptic messages, the voices I was hearing. Piece by piece, it all started to feel connected.

In the last week of February, two sheriff's deputies came to the house, served me with paperwork, and told me I had to leave immediately. I packed what I could and stayed in a hotel for about a week, but with only a few belongings and no clear plan, I decided to return to the house, believing I still had the right to be there under my rental agreement with the owner.

On the morning of March 7th, while I was still lying in bed, two Seattle Police Department officers entered my room and arrested me for allegedly violating the no-contact order that had been issued by the King County Sheriff's Department two weeks earlier. They pulled me from my bed and handcuffed me on the spot. I spent one night in the county jail and was released the next day. No formal complaint was ever filed against me, and the case was dismissed without prejudice.

NOTES

- I called 911 twice before the protection order was filed against me to report my roommate's abusive behavior, but the police refused to make a report or look into it.
- I never found out who the people staying next door were, nor did I get information about my neighbors whereabouts.
- The voices continued so I contacted the Mayor, a senator and a few other departments in Seattle.

SUMMARY

On the afternoon of March 10th, I walked to my former residence to check on my belongings. My former roommate had texted me the night before, asking when I planned to pick up my things. At the time, I didn't have a place to move everything, but I wanted to see if there was anything small or important enough to take with me.
Another reason I returned was to see if the neighbor next door had come back with her kids. I knocked on her front door, then went to her side door and knocked again. A moment later, a woman opened the front door and called out my name. She sounded like my neighbor, but did not look like her. I approached her front steps and told her I was looking for a tote bag that might have been left at her house. I couldn't think of anything else to say to explain why I had knocked. She said no such bag was there and asked if I needed one. I thanked her, declined, and asked if she had seen Toby, the homeowner. She replied, "I am Toby. I just might look a little different—I've gained weight and changed my hair." I looked at her, said "okay," apologized, and walked next door to my former residence. When I got there, I knocked several times but no one answered. I went around to the back door, which was unlocked, knocked again, and entered. I called out my former roommate's name and heard a distant "Hello." As usual, he was upstairs and hadn't heard me knocking. I called up to him from the bottom of the stairs, asking if I could come up. He agreed, so I went upstairs.

We spoke briefly—small talk. He asked how I was; I asked the same. I told him I was hungry and had no money because I had just gotten out of jail a few nights earlier. He told me to check the spot where he usually kept cash. There was $40. I asked if I could borrow it, and he agreed. Shortly after, I left to get food from a nearby store while he remained at the house.

As I was returning—about a block away—three officers, one in full military camouflage, rounded the corner and approached me. They immediately placed me in handcuffs, stating I was not allowed on the property due to an active protection order. I told them I believed the order had been amended or lifted, and that I had paperwork in my pocket to prove it. One officer glanced at the document, then folded it and handed it back to me.

They had me sit on the fender of their vehicle while they searched my backpack. Meanwhile, the officer in camouflage went to speak with my former roommate on the front porch.

After the search, the officers put my backpack in their vehicle. A female officer then approached and asked how I was doing. I told her I was stressed because I thought the protection order had been dismissed when I was released from jail two days earlier. She said they were still looking into it, then asked what I liked to do in my free time. I told her I liked to read, then asked if I could tell her something that might sound strange. She said yes, so I quietly explained that I believed I was being harmed by some form of technology. I didn't know where it was coming from, but I explained that voices were taunting and threatening me. At one point, they told me everything was being recorded and could be accessed by dialing 1-800-732-6029, then extension 302, followed by the code word "LB Daniels"—the name of a diner my great-grandparents used to take my sisters and me to as children. The officer wrote the number on the palm of her hand and walked away.
What I didn't mention was that the night before, I had gone to the emergency room at Swedish Hospital because I was in pain and hearing voices. After triage, I was taken to a room where several medical staff were present. One doctor began examining my head with a large magnet. He moved it around and then paused, saying, "Here it is—a microchip." I was already in pain and scared, and hearing that nearly made me break down. I asked for an X-ray or MRI to confirm it, but he refused and told me to leave.
Back on the street, after speaking with my former roommate, the officers returned and put me in their vehicle. The one in military gear stood by the curb. I still don't know why someone in military uniform was present, but I assumed it was related to the recent Black Lives Matter protests or calls to defund the police.

As we drove away, I noticed we were heading north, away from downtown where the county jail is located. I began to panic, thinking I might be taken to a military base or camp and subjected to more harm—or worse. After several minutes, we arrived at a large fenced area that looked like a secure police vehicle lot. The gate opened, we pulled in and parked. The officer brought me into a small building. Aside from one other officer, the place was empty.

I was placed in a single holding cell for about an hour. The officer later returned, released me from the cell, and drove me to the county jail downtown. I was never told why we had stopped at that facility, and it was never mentioned again during my time in custody.
Due to COVID-related social distancing and overcrowding, I was transferred to another facility outside the city. I had court the next day—March 11th—and was surprised to learn the City of Seattle had filed charges for violating a no-contact order and theft. I didn't believe I had violated the order, and I certainly didn't steal the money—I had asked for it, and it had been given willingly. I also believed the temporary protection order had already been lifted by the time I was released.

Before my court appearance, I briefly met someone standing in for my assigned public defender. They seemed unaware of the details of my case. Instead of investigating the protection order, they raised the issue of competency to stand trial. The judge granted this and scheduled a competency evaluation and a hearing for March 22nd.
A few days later, a protection order was delivered to my cell dated March 10th, the same day I was arrested. This was the first time I saw it. I immediately wrote a kite (inmate message) to the release planner to get contact info for my public defender. On March 19th, someone arrived to conduct a psychiatric evaluation, but I had yet to hear from my defender, so I chose not to participate and left the room. The competency hearing originally set for March 22nd was canceled. A new hearing was held on March 24th, but I was not present. That day, the judge dismissed the charges without prejudice and ordered that I be referred to a treatment facility for evaluation.

Later that same day, I was released from jail—but immediately transferred to the hospital across the street. I was confused because I had not received any paperwork explaining this transfer from the court.

NOTES

- The officers listed on the police report were not the officers who arrested me. The officers present were named: Williams, Harris and one other police officer then someone from the military named Heiffer (or something close to that spelling)
- An order to redact the competency evaluation dated March 22nd was included with the court documents, which I did not receive while in jail or in the hospital. I obtained from e-services.
- The paperwork to obtain a protection order filed by my former roommate included an email from our former neighbor, Toby. This is not something she would have done - completely out of character for her.
- Voice to skull was (and still is) being used on me as a form of torture causing bodily harm and pain. After being released from the hospital the pain increased (see notes below)

Harborview Hospital
Court Order: 72hr Hold
Ordering Judge: Damon Shadid
Date Of Arrest: 03/24/2021
Date Of Release: 04/15/2021

SUMMARY

Upon my release from jail, I was informed that I would be transferred to Harborview Hospital for a 72-hour hold. However, no such order was documented in my release paperwork, and I had no medical or psychological concerns at the time. I was officially released from jail and in my street clothes but was not permitted to leave the facility.

Two officers came over and put handcuffs on me and had me follow them to a vehicle, which looked like it was used to pick up stray dogs and bring them to the pound. The back had no windows and there was hardly enough room for my legs. It was not something I had ever seen before. We left the jail and drove directly across the street to Harborview Hospital and pulled into the emergency room entrance.

When we arrived at Harborview's emergency room, the situation was confusing and disorganized. Two officers escorted me into the building and immediately shouted toward the nearest hospital staff member, asking where they should place me. The staff member approached and began asking the officers questions—questions they were unable to answer. The hospital employee then walked us over to a computer at the nurse's station and asked me to sit in a chair beside it while he and the officers attempted to determine who had ordered the hold. I overheard the staff member mention, during a phone call, that the court contact was someone named Marianna. I did not recognize the name, but I heard the officers mutter a few words in acknowledgment as if they knew her.

Eventually, I was moved from the chair to a nearby hospital bed. It was positioned awkwardly and offered no privacy—there was no curtain or partition. Shortly afterward, several hospital staff members approached me. One nurse, in particular, was carrying a large syringe and spoke rudely. As she moved closer, the other staff surrounded the bed, forming a wall around me. Their presence felt intimidating and borderline threatening. The nurse grabbed my upper arm and wiped it with an alcohol pad. I immediately stated that I felt fine and did not want any medication. Despite this, the officers forcefully pushed me onto the bed and held my arms down. I panicked and shouted for them to stop. They insisted it was necessary to "calm me down," even though I had remained calm up to that point and exhibited no signs of distress. The nurse injected the syringe into my arm without informing me of what the substance was and without performing a medical screening.

Afterward, I lay on the bed feeling dizzy. Eventually, I was walked to a small room away from the main emergency area. It appeared to be a converted supply closet, containing only a small bed and no sink or restroom. Once inside, the door was shut and locked behind me. I was confined to the space, unable to leave, though I could move about within its limited area.

A few hours later, someone informed me that I was being moved to another floor. Soon after, a group of staff arrived with a hospital bed and asked me to climb onto it. Once I laid down, they raised the side rails and pulled out leather restraints. I immediately felt a surge of panic. They proceeded to tie both my arms to the rails. Then they rolled the bed out of the room, through the main ER floor, past other patients and hospital staff, in what felt like a public display of humiliation.

We arrived on what I believe was the 8th floor, where I was placed in a crowded room with several other patients. Each bed had curtains for partial privacy. I remained restrained as I listened to a nearby patient yelling at the staff. Eventually, a male staff member approached me and began speaking. His name badge read “Shane J,” which stood out to me since it matched my own first name and middle initial. Distracted by the coincidence, I missed much of what he said. He later returned with a portable x-ray machine and took a chest image, even though I had no respiratory symptoms, cough, or chest pain.

After the x-ray, a doctor informed me that I would moved to a medical floor and admitted as a patient because he was concerned about a dark spot found on my lung. He said an order to get an MRI was put in. Still strapped to the bed, I was taken to another floor of the hospital and placed into a private room. A nurse came in and connected an IV and handed me a small plastic urinal then released one of my arms from the restraint.

Later that evening I was taken to the MRI room and given a contrast agent through my IV, which made me nauseous and caused me to throw up. Once the scan was complete, I was returned to my room.

Later, the medical team reconnected my IV and listed a few medications—one of which was Haloperidol, Risperdal and another for leg cramps. One medication was administered via injection to my abdomen, and the other was given as a pill, if I recall correctly.

Shortly after the injection, I began experiencing severe, involuntary muscle contractions. My limbs twisted and stiffened, my neck locked, and my stomach began to spasm violently—it felt like being repeatedly punched from the inside. My speech became slurred, and I started drooling. Panic set in, making it even harder to breathe. I had no idea what was happening to me. The spasms lasted for over two hours, and the abdominal pain continued through the night.
The next day, various medical professionals came through to ask about my medical and mental health history. They ordered bloodwork, and nurses changed the IV bag regularly. At this point, I was officially admitted to the hospital as a medical patient.

Then came the test results. I was shocked to learn that I had tested positive for neurosyphilis and possibly tuberculosis, along with signs of an acute lung infection. I was confident that my vaccines were up to date, so they ran more tests and ultimately ruled out TB. The treatment plan included 500 mL of intravenous penicillin per day for seven days, along with a lumbar puncture (spinal tap).

While this may have been the appropriate treatment, I never consented to it—I had been admitted under duress and without voluntary agreement. To make matters worse, I was moved from the medical unit to a psychiatric floor midway through my treatment, which ended up being two weeks and for reasons that were never explained.

NOTES

- It was not until after I was released from jail and then the hospital did I find out there was an order from the court for a 72 hour hold, but I was not given the paperwork while in jail nor did I receive anything related to it while I was in the hospital.
- The initial judgement states a triage evaluator would do an evaluation to determine the necessary treatment. I was not evaluated before being treated and admitted as a medical patient.
- I received a letter from Apple Health, my former provider, saying I did not need to be in the hospital for treatment and to release me on April 5th. Instead, the hospital kept me on psychiatric floor until April 15th and continued the intravenous penicillin treatment.

IN WASHINGTON STATE AND KING COUNTY

- Tuberculosis (TB): King County saw a 15% increase in TB cases in 2021 compared to 2020. Seattle accounted for a significant portion (43%) of these cases. There was a notable outbreak of TB in Washington state prisons in 2021-2022, considered the state's largest in 20 years. This was attributed in part to the suspension of routine screenings during the COVID-19 pandemic.

- Syphilis: King County experienced a significant rise in syphilis cases, including congenital syphilis, with a 67% increase in congenital syphilis cases in 2023 compared to 2021. Syphilis cases increased by 49% in Washington between 2019 and 2021. Public Health - Seattle & King County formed a Syphilis Task Force to address the epidemic.

SUMMARY

On the afternoon of May 15th, I walked over to the house I had been removed from to pick up my mail. The homeowner—my former roommate—had texted me the night before to let me know that some mail had arrived for me and that it looked important. He said he would leave it in the mailbox. But when I got there, the mailbox was empty. I knocked several times on the front door, and when no one answered, I walked around to the back. I knocked on the back door as well—again, no answer. So I decided to leave.

I started heading toward the main road a few blocks away to catch my bus. Before I made it to the bus stop, a police vehicle pulled up next to me. The officer rolled down his window and asked if I was alright. I told him I was fine, but in truth, I was afraid he might harm me. The trauma from my past arrests has made me deeply distrustful of police. I began walking away quickly. The officer pulled ahead and attempted to stop. Before he could get out of the car, I ran.

I sprinted up the hill to the main highway and into the parking lot of a hotel on the corner. Moments later, I saw the same officer speeding into the hotel's other driveway. I ran inside and anxiously asked the front desk clerk if there was a back exit so I could avoid the officer who was now pursuing me. The clerk told me there wasn't another entrance or exit. So I ran back outside, past the police vehicle. The officer was still inside and hadn't turned on his lights, so I wasn't sure why I was being chased. I continued running down the driveway and back to the highway, heading toward the bus stop.

Before I could get there, two more police vehicles sped toward me with their lights on. I stopped running and let them approach. They immediately got out, put me in handcuffs, and asked why I had run. I told them I was afraid and didn't understand what the original officer was doing—he hadn't tried to arrest me or signaled for me to stop. They informed me I was being arrested for violating a court order.

I explained that my former roommate—the person who filed the protection order—was the same one who had told me to come pick up my mail. I also mentioned that he's rarely home, which made me question how the police knew I had even stopped at the restricted address.

I was taken to the county jail and released two days later. I didn't speak with anyone while I was there. Eventually, the case was dismissed due to "competency," based on information from a redacted competency evaluation dated 3/22/21.

NOTES

- A redacted competency evaluation was referenced in court, but did get the the case dismissed.
- The order of release stated "dismiss and defer", I was never deferred after release
- I was then and still am a victim of voice to skull torture, causing bodily harm, extreme exhaustion and anxiety.
- The police report said the neighbor contacted 911, which would be out of character for her and I had already contacted the police months prior to let them know I had not seen that neighbor in months and the people in the home were not the homeowners.

SUMMARY

On the evening of July 23rd, I was walking to a friend's house in downtown Seattle when two unmarked vehicles approached me near Columbia Street and 4th Avenue. The vehicles pulled over abruptly, and the occupants asked if my name was Jonathan Nelson. I looked over and told them that was not my name, but before I could finish my sentence, several individuals jumped out and grabbed my arms.

From what I remember, they were not wearing standard police uniforms, and no agency name was visible on either their clothing or the vehicles. They removed the backpack I was carrying, handcuffed me without any explanation, and did not read me my Miranda rights. They had me sit on the curb while they inspected the contents of my bag.

Strangely, one of them then pulled something out of his pocket and walked over to me—it was a photocopy of a man's passport and Social Security card. The man pictured was older and looked nothing like me. The officer asked why that document had been found in the backpack I was carrying. I told them it had absolutely no connection to me—it wasn't mine, and it had never been in my possession.

Despite this, they placed me under arrest—again, without reading me my rights—put me into one of the unmarked vehicles, and drove me to the county jail just a few blocks away.

It was only during the booking process at the jail that I was finally informed of the charges against me. They included felony harassment, telephone harassment, cyberstalking, threats against the mayor of Seattle and a Seattle detective, violation of a no-contact order (a misdemeanor), and felony threats to bomb or damage property at the University of Washington and Harborview Medical Research Center. They also took my phone and logged it as evidence for my case—giving them full access to my device, even though no warrant had been issued at the time. After being booked, I was transferred to a facility outside of the city because only half of the county jail was operating due to COVID-19 social distancing laws still in effect.

A couple of days later, I had a video conference call with Amy Parker, the public defender assigned to my case. During the call, she informed me that the police claimed they found emails, phone calls, and posts on a Twitter account allegedly threatening and harassing government officials and law enforcement officers. This, she said, was enough for them to use probable cause to track my location and arrest me. Before ending the call, she told me court was scheduled for August 10th and that she would meet me there.

On the day of court, Amy and I met briefly before appearing before the judge. She handed me the court paperwork and a report from the police investigation and instructed me not to say anything while we were in front of the judge. In court, Amy suggested it would be in my best interest to raise the issue of competency and have a mental health evaluation done instead of proceeding to trial.

At the time, I wasn't sure what that meant, and frankly, it bothered me. I felt mentally sound—just frustrated that no one seemed interested in hearing my side of the story. Amy explained that a competency evaluation would take place followed by a competency hearing to determine if I needed to be sent to an inpatient facility to be "restored" in order to stand trial. Afterward, she told me someone would contact me from from the DSHS to do the evaluation then she would contact me to let me know when the competency hearing would be scheduled.

Once court ended, I was taken back to the facility outside the city to await my next hearing. A month passed with no word from Amy. Then, a man named Kevin came to meet with me. He told me he was a mitigation specialist working with Amy on my case. Kevin asked me a few questions related to the charges and about my overall well-being. I appreciated that he took the time to listen—it made me feel slightly better about the situation and a little more optimistic that the case might eventually be dismissed.

On September 2nd, I was called into the release planner's office to meet with someone from the county. They told me they wanted to ask a few questions for something called a "needs report," explaining that it would help the county better understand what services they could offer to those released from jail. I was told my responses would be confidential and would not be used against me or my case, so I decided to participate and answer their questions.

About a week later, someone from the court delivered paperwork to my cell. It was a court order signed by Judge Melinda Young, mandating a 45-day inpatient restoration at Western State Hospital. I was confused when I read it—no competency evaluation had ever taken place, and I had never been given a date for a competency hearing.

The order referenced an evaluation supposedly completed on August 31st and stated that I would be transferred to the inpatient facility within 14 days of the order's issuance. It also listed the next court date as October 19th. The judge's signature was on the document, but my attorney's was not. Instead, it simply read "approved on record" in the space where her signature should have been.

It struck me as deeply strange that a hearing of this importance could have occurred without either me or my attorney present. I immediately used my free phone call to contact Amy Parker and left her a message.

When I didn't hear back, I wrote to the release planner at the jail and asked if she could find out more about the evaluation mentioned in the order and help me get in touch with my attorney. A few days later, she responded, saying the evaluation was not part of jail services and advised me to contact my attorney directly. I sent her another message, again asking for help reaching Amy.

Keep in mind—sending messages or "kites" while in jail is painfully slow, but it's the only way to access services. I finally received a response from the release planner on October 22, which was already after the court-ordered transfer date had passed—and I still hadn't been moved to the inpatient facility.

Her message read:
Hello Mr. Lozenich, I wanted to let you know that per Amy Parker, she is still your attorney and working on your behalf. According to Amy, you have a motion hearing scheduled for 10/27/21. She stated that it is possible you could win and be released. Seeing that you could be getting out next week, I have re-scheduled an appointment with DSHS so that you can re-apply for benefits. The appointment is scheduled for 9:30 AM Monday.

Based on her message, I assumed I wouldn't need to be transferred to the inpatient facility after all—especially since the court order date had already lapsed and there was a chance of release. I responded saying I would not be applying for benefits at that time and repeated my earlier request for a copy of the August 31st evaluation.

Before committing to anything with DSHS, I wanted to know what that evaluation contained—especially if it included any conditions, like a requirement for outpatient treatment. DSHS oversees both Western State Hospital and competency evaluations, so I believed it was critical to know exactly what was documented before moving forward.

Then, on October 26, the state submitted an affidavit to the court, which was reviewed at a hearing on October 28. I wasn't given the opportunity to review the state's filing, so I was left in the dark about how my attorney was planning to respond. Another hearing was scheduled for late November.

On November 22, the day of that next hearing, I was taken out of my cell and lined up with other inmates for transport. When the officers called out names for the courthouse, they stopped at mine and told me I was not going to court, but instead being transferred to Western State Hospital.

This abrupt change felt deceptive and unsettling. I had assumed the inpatient transfer was off the table, and now I was being rerouted without clear explanation. It made me question the legitimacy of the process and whether I could trust what was happening.

Upon arrival at the hospital, I was forced to take a COVID booster Then I was ordered to take 20mg of olanzapine after a mandatory meeting with the facility psychiatrist, supposedly as part of a "restoration" plan.

When I asked why I was being medicated, the psychiatrist said it was due to a meeting I had with DSHS back in 2017, which he claimed showed signs of anxiety or a similar issue. In truth, that 2017 interaction was just a stressful visit to apply for food stamps after struggling to find work. I left the DSHS office early because I felt overwhelmed by the lack of privacy during the interview. A few days later, the office manager called and invited me to finish the process privately in her office.

That's it. There was no evaluation at that time or interview — just a routine, incomplete benefits appointment. I can only assume that because DSHS and Western State Hospital are interconnected, someone used that minor incident to retroactively justify the restoration order, despite no formal competency evaluation ever being conducted prior to my transfer.

By January I had finished the restoration program early and was released from Western State Hospital and returned to the county jail. I was anticipating a trial, but my attorney advised having the case moved to "mental health court" which would allow me to get released from jail and have the charges dropped provided I complete an 18 month program after release. Still, I would have preferred to stand trial and speak to the judge about the details of my case, but my attorney said if my case went to trial and the jury found me guilty, I would have go back to jail for up to 18 months. Since another option was not presented to me and the thought of staying in jail or having to go back to jail sounded awful, we decided to proceeded with her option to move the case. By the end of January I was released from jail, however there was no mention of the case being moved to mental health court or an order to complete any program listed as conditions of release.

NOTES

- According to the U.S. Bomb Data Center, the number of bomb threats in the United States increased in 2021. The center, which is run by the U.S. Department of Justice, reported 1,876 bomb threats and 4,935 suspicious or unattended packages in 381 bombing-related incidents in 2021. This was a 56% increase in explosive incidents from 2015
- According to Check Point Research, cyberattacks increased 50% year-over-year, with each organization facing 925 cyberattacks per week globally. As per the statistics, businesses witnessed 50% more attacks per week in 2021 compared to 2020.
- Prior to this arrest my personal information was exposed in a data breach by the WA state unemployment office and a few of my email accounts, contacts and apps were hacked. I contacted several local government officials to report this issue as they were responsible for the data breach initially, but did not get a response from any of them.
- Since the protection order was still in place, I was not able to go to back to the house I was living in and had a lease for. This made finding a job very difficult.
- I was and still am a victim of voice to skull torture or electronic harassment which has caused pain to my head and body, extreme exhaustion and emotional distress. The abusers can see through my eyes and hear what I hear. I believe this was being used as a form of espionage to get information about my case and other inmates in my cell. I reported the issue several times, but none of the jail staff would look into it.
- The terrorists using the voice to skull on me forced me to hear a bus blow up with passengers on it. I am not sure where they were but they threatened blowing up an airplane as well.

Order For Restoration

Ordered Date Of Transfer: 10/19/2021
Actual Date Of Transfer: 11/22/2021
Date Of Release: 1/05/2022
Location: Western State Hospital

SUMMARY

I was ordered into a 45-day inpatient restoration program at Western State Hospital, despite already completing a similar program at Harborview Medical Center earlier that same year. No competency evaluation was conducted before my transfer—an order that wasn't even carried out until nearly a month after its issue. Upon arrival, I was forcibly given a COVID booster and, following a mandatory session with a facility psychiatrist, placed on 20mg of olanzapine—a powerful antipsychotic—as part of a so-called "restoration" plan.

When I questioned the medication, the psychiatrist cited a 2017 meeting I had with DSHS, claiming it indicated signs of anxiety. In truth, that visit was simply a stressful attempt to apply for food assistance while unemployed. I had left early due to lack of privacy, and a few days later was invited back to finish the process in a private office—no evaluation, no diagnosis, nothing clinical. Yet somehow, this uneventful moment was dredged up years later to justify forced medication and confinement. It seems DSHS and Western State operate with overlapping narratives that serve the system, not the individual.

During my time at Western, I felt acutely out of place. Many patients around me were in visibly severe mental states—one urinated in the corner of a common room, another stood screaming on tables, and another had to be restrained after violent outbursts. My presence among them was not just inappropriate—it was insulting. My thoughts were labeled as "redirectable," and I was told not to speak about certain topics. The evaluation referenced redacted material that had already been nullified by another judge earlier that year. That very material, despite being legally void, was weaponized against me.

Still, I completed the program early, was declared "restored" and competent to stand trial, and released. An affidavit was later added to my court file—a silent paper trail behind an experience that never should have happened.

- Information from a redacted competency evaluation from 2021 was used against me by the evaluator and psychiatrist at the hospital.

IMPACT:

July 2021-January 2022
Significant focus on avoiding a government shutdown, with multiple critical deadlines approaching in that time span. Here's an overview of the shutdown risks and how they were navigated during this period:

July 2021: Tensions Building Over Infrastructure and Budget Talks
In the summer of 2021, government funding wasn't immediately threatened, but tensions rose as discussions over infrastructure and a broader spending agenda began to unfold. Congress was grappling with two major pieces of legislation: the infrastructure bill and the reconciliation package, the latter tied to a broader social and climate agenda that could impact government spending priorities.
However, no actual shutdown threat loomed in July, as Congress was focused on crafting these deals.

September 2021: The First Close Call
As the fiscal year (FY) was drawing to a close on September 30, 2021, a shutdown risk emerged due to stalled negotiations on government funding. Several factors played into the risk:

- Debt Ceiling: The U.S. faced an urgent need to address the debt ceiling, which had been suspended for years but needed to be raised to prevent a default.
- Budgetary Deadlock: Democrats and Republicans were at an impasse over government spending levels and policy issues.

WHAT HAPPENED:

- On September 30, 2021, Congress passed a short-term funding bill known as a continuing resolution to fund the government through December 3, 2021.
- The bill also included an emergency debt ceiling suspension, but the impasse continued, especially on issues like COVID relief funding and social programs.

This temporary fix kept the government operational but created another looming risk as December approached.

December 2021: A Shutdown Threat Over Vaccine Mandates
As December 2021 arrived, the shutdown threat again emerged. This time, it was driven by Republican opposition to President Biden's vaccine mandates for large businesses. Republicans in Congress tied funding decisions to halting these mandates, setting up a tense standoff.

WHAT HAPPENED:

- On December 2, 2021, after considerable negotiation, Congress passed a short-term funding bill to extend government operations through February 18, 2022.
- This bill prevented a shutdown by funding the government temporarily while allowing time to address the ongoing debates over the vaccination mandates and other policy priorities.

The government was spared from shutting down, but the contentious political environment around the budget remained unresolved, making the early months of 2022 critical.

January 2022: Final Crisis Averted
By January 2022, the short-term funding measure passed in December was approaching its expiration date, and the political debate over the $1.75 trillion Build Back Better Act and various government funding issues continued. The deadlock was still holding up more permanent resolutions to the budget.

WHAT HAPPENED:

- By January 2022, Congress had only a few weeks left to negotiate a more lasting funding deal to prevent a shutdown when the February 18 deadline approached.
- While the debate over larger social spending and other priorities was still heated, no shutdown occurred during the final days of January 2022, as temporary solutions were used to avoid closure.

CONCLUSION

Between July 2021 and January 2022, the U.S. government faced significant fiscal challenges, but several continuing resolutions were passed to avoid shutdowns. These stopgap measures temporarily funded the government through the key deadlines, while larger legislative battles over infrastructure, social spending, and vaccination mandates were unresolved.

The near-shutdowns and political brinkmanship that marked this period highlighted ongoing tensions in the U.S. government over budgetary priorities, partisan divisions, and the broader economic recovery efforts following the COVID-19 pandemic.

2021 was a year where the U.S. government teetered on the edge of shutdown not once, but twice, each time narrowly averting disaster through last-minute legislative maneuvers.

January 2021: Averted Shutdown with Omnibus Spending Bill
In late December 2020, Congress passed a $1.4 trillion omnibus spending bill, which included a $900 billion COVID-19 relief package. This legislation funded the government through September 2021, providing stability amid the pandemic's economic turmoil. President Donald Trump signed the measure into law on December 27, 2020, averting a potential shutdown at the start of the new year. National Guard Association (Guardsmen)

City Of Seattle Vs Shane Lozenich
Judge: Damon Shadid
Date Of Arrest: 03/30/2022
Date Of Release: 03/31/2022
Charges: Violation Of A Court Order - No Complaint Filed, Case Dismissed

SUMMARY

After being released from jail in January, I had nowhere to go, so I returned to the house where I had been living in order to save money before moving into a place of my own. Although my former roommate had an active protection order against me, he agreed to let me stay there temporarily.

On March 30th, Brian (my former roommate) and I were on our way to the grocery store to get something for dinner. We exited through the back door and walked toward the front of the house. Waiting in the front yard were two police officers who immediately handcuffed me, saying I was in violation of a court order. Brian told them it was okay that I was staying there, but they said it wasn't his decision to make—the court order was what mattered.

They placed me in their vehicle and transported me to the county jail. I spent one night in custody and was released the next day. No attorney was appointed to me, and no formal complaint was filed. After my release, I didn't return to my former residence but stayed with a friend until I was able to secure a place of my own.

NOTES

- The case from July 2021 was still pending at this time. I would have thought this would have settled that matter, but it did not.
- I was then and still am a victim of voice to skull torture, causing bodily harm, extreme exhaustion and anxiety.

Case No. 22-1-04242-3sea
State Of Washington vs Shane Lozenich
Attorney: Jordan Murov-Goodman
Date Of Arrest: 08/10/2022
Date Of Release: 05/05/2023
Charge: Felony Threats Against The Governor- Case Pending In King County Courts, Archived In Washington State Courts.

SUMMARY

On the afternoon of August 10th, someone claiming to be a social worker from King County knocked on my apartment door, requesting to speak with me. I was getting ready for work and did not have time to talk, so I yelled through the door and told him to leave. He refused and kept knocking while shouting my name. I ignored him and waited for the knocking to stop, as it seemed reasonable at the time because he made me feel uncomfortable and was a complete stranger who had somehow gained access to my apartment building and found my unit.

About 20 minutes later, the knocking had stopped, and it was finally quiet. I looked through the peephole and saw that the hallway was clear, so I opened my door to leave for work. I had only taken a few steps from my unit when I was ambushed by several men in uniform who had been hiding around the corner. Some of the men appeared to be wearing Seattle police uniforms, while others were dressed in what looked like military attire. One of the men in military-style clothing handcuffed me and told me I was being arrested for threatening the governor of Washington State. He did not provide any paperwork or a warrant, nor did he read me my rights. He then proceeded to ask me a series of questions without an attorney present, all while standing in the hallway of my apartment building. After his public interrogation, I was brought over to a second officer, who was in a police uniform. For some reason, he took my handcuffs off and put another pair on before proceeding to ask me the same questions the other officer had asked.

Once he finished questioning me, the two men, who looked like they were from the military, escorted me down to the main entrance and then outside. Parked in front of my building was a Washington State Police vehicle with an officer waiting inside. I was put in that vehicle while the other two men got into one parked behind us. The Washington State officer drove me exactly five blocks to the county jail, with the other two following behind. From my perspective, I was arrested by someone from the military and a police officer, then handed over to a Washington State Police officer. It was confusing, and at no point was a warrant or court order provided to validate the arrest or explain how they had gained access to my secure apartment building. A key fob is required at the main entrance, and a hard key is needed to operate the elevator to my floor. There is no remote access to the building of any kind.

Once we arrived at the jail, we drove around to the back and parked in a small parking lot. We then waited there for about an hour while the other officers entered information into a laptop. After they finished, they walked over to us and said we could proceed into the jail. The officer who had driven me was the one to escort me inside. When we entered the booking area, I was placed in a holding tank while he dropped off my belongings with the jail staff. The booking process seemed normal, but I did notice a difference in the way the booking numbers appeared on my wristband compared to the last time I was in jail. After being booked, I was brought to my cell in general population.

A few days later, I was scheduled for court to determine whether the State of Washington would file charges against me. At the time of my arrest, I had already been working with an attorney named Christine on an ongoing case. I expected she would be present or at least contact me prior to the hearing. Instead, a new public defender appeared—someone I had never met. She had little knowledge of my background and only a few minutes to speak with me before we entered the courtroom.

Like many court-appointed attorneys, she advised me not to say anything. When my case was called, she made an effort to get clarification from the opposing side. The prosecutor read off a list of claims—some of which were false, others tied to a separate, unresolved case. My new attorney mostly ignored this and instead questioned how the alleged threats had been communicated. The judge clarified that the supposed threats were left in a voicemail on the governor's office line—not received by the governor directly, but by someone in his office.

The judge then finished with a decision to file charges against me even though the plaintiff never got the threat directly and no evidence was presented—just accusations. I wasn't surprised but felt frustrated because I was forced to share deeply personal information with an unfamiliar attorney—someone I hadn't built trust with, and barely had time to explain my side to. After this, my case was returned to Christine, my original attorney, who simply tacked the new charge onto the case she was already handling.

What followed was an arraignment, then an omnibus hearing—one I believed would work in my favor, given Christine now had ample time to prepare. Instead, she followed a disturbing pattern. Like another attorney before her, Amy, she raised concerns about my mental competency—stating I suffered from "delusions" and couldn't rationally discuss the case. This came as a shock. I had already been evaluated and deemed competent to stand trial. Nothing had changed, except my attorney's strategy.

A new competency evaluation was set for late August. It had to be rescheduled because the phone system in the visitor's booth made communication impossible. The evaluator returned days later and completed the assessment with me on September 8th. On September 13th—just one day before my scheduled hearing—Christine visited me and told me the judge had already ordered a 45-day restoration commitment to Western State Hospital. However, no bed was available yet. I asked how such an order had been filed before the hearing even took place. She gave no clear answer, and I realized then we were not on the same side. Despite having already been deemed competent, I was left in limbo. What followed were ten more months in jail. I heard nothing from my attorney. During that time, the jail's water supply became contaminated. Many of us fell sick. I was also assaulted by an ex-Marine in my cell. He pulled me from my top bunk, slammed me to the floor, and beat me—fracturing my nose, punching my face, and choking me. Afterward, I was placed in solitary confinement. Medical staff treated my injuries, took photos, and completed an incident report.

I spent a few days in that cell, which had no mattress or sheets and was covered in swastika graffiti. Eventually, I spoke with someone from classifications who deemed me the victim and arranged for me to return to general population in a new cell, away from my attacker. Despite this, the jail never pressed charges against the person who assaulted me, nor did they inform my attorney. I thought it was standard practice to protect the victim.

Finally, during the first week of May, my attorney came to discuss my release and the dismissal of my case. She stated that I was being held against my will, that my rights were being violated, and suggested filing a Hand motion along with a request for dismissal. I had court twice that week, which resulted in credit for time served and my release from jail—but no dismissal of the case. On May 5th, I was released—after serving a full sentence without a trial, conviction, or plea deal—while still facing the possibility of being sent back to a mental hospital for a minimum of 14 to 45 days.

More than a year has passed since my release, and in that time, my case has been handed off to multiple attorneys. Each time, I have had to re-explain the details of my case as if we were just starting over. While I was in jail, I lost my job, fell ten months behind on rent, and had to rebuild my life from scratch. The attorneys have done little to help. They are difficult to reach, rarely respond to my emails, and do not seem to have a strong defense prepared—if any at all. My case is still pending in superior court, and I still face the possibility of being sent back to a hospital for "restoration," even though I have never been given a trial.

NOTES

- A transcription of the voicemail was never submitted nor was a description of what was said. No other evidence has been presented or mentioned
- The charges filed by the State of Washington against me coincided with a wave of lawsuits and even a Supreme Court ruling against Governor Jay Inslee. This could explain why the judge has repeatedly granted continuances at every motion hearing to close my case—delaying it month after month. It's now been over two years, and my case remains unresolved in Washington State Superior Court
- I was and still am victim of voice to skull torture or electronic harassment which has caused bodily harm and extreme exhaustion. My abusers can see through my eyes seeing what I see and even hear what I hear. I believe it was also used as a form of espionage to get information about my case and others in my cell.

DSHS OPINION 2022

He demonstrated good effort and there was no indication he was exaggerating or fabricating symptoms of mental illness. He was alert and attentive. No impaired sensorium or motor activity was observed or reported. Mr. Lozenich's speech was rapid and otherwise unremarkable in tone, volume, pronunciation, or prosody. His thought processes were generally goal-directed, linear, and organized.

During this interview, Mr. Lozenich quickly began to discuss his mother's disappearance. As the interview progressed, it became apparent this was a central theme to any conversation he would have. Moreover, it became apparent his preoccupations regarding his mother's disappearance were connected to other beliefs that appeared paranoid and directly related to his charges, his understanding of the role of the court, and his approach to his defense. He demonstrated a good understanding of the charges against him and there was no indication he did not understand his legal options and their potential penalties. There was no indication he lacked an understanding of the adversarial nature of court proceedings and the roles of the different participants. However, he was adamant he needed to speak to the disappearance of his neighbors, and he provided a convoluted story that he believed needed to be shared with the court that was most likely delusional in nature. When it came to his 2022 charge, M.r Lozenich stated he would follow his attorney's direction to not talk about his mother's disappearance. However, it is unlikely he would actually be able to abstain from discussing her disappearance based on his tendency to do so during the interview and how he perceived it to be at the chore of his behaviors. This would likely prevent him from participating in a trial in a reality-based, logical, meaningful, and effective manner. This perseveration on delusional themes would likely make it difficult for him to disclose pertinent facts of the case without interference from delusional beliefs. His ability to reason through his legal options would likely be impaired by his tendency to focus on these delusional themes and prioritize his search for his mother. Although he did not appear to have the best relationship with current counsel, he also indicated she knew best and it is possible he would continue to work with her. Based on his current placement in general population without difficulties and his presentation during this evaluation, Mr. Lozenich demonstrated the ability to behave appropriately. However, it is unclear how he would react if not given an opportunity to discuss delusional themes while in court. It is the undersigned's professional opinion that due to symptoms of a mental disease or defect Mr. Lozenich lacked the capacity to understand the nature of the legal proceedings against him and he lacks the capacity to assist in his defense.

IMPACT FROM ARREST 2022-2023

DATES: AUGUST 2022-MAY 2023
Significant discussions and concerns regarding a potential U.S. federal government shutdown.

AUGUST 2022:
As the fiscal year approached its end on September 30, 2022, lawmakers faced pressure to pass appropriations bills to fund the government. Disagreements over spending priorities and policy provisions raised concerns about a possible shutdown.

SEPTEMBER 2022:
To avert a shutdown, Congress passed a continuing resolution (CR) that extended government funding through December 16, 2022. This stopgap measure provided temporary relief but set up another deadline for lawmakers to negotiate full-year appropriations. Congress Averts Government Shutdown

DECEMBER 2022:
With the CR's expiration looming, Congress passed an omnibus spending bill to fund the government through September 30, 2023, thereby avoiding a shutdown. The bill included various provisions and funding allocations across federal agencies. Early 2023: Despite the passage of the omnibus bill, discussions about fiscal responsibility and debt ceiling concerns persisted. While these debates did not immediately threaten a shutdown, they set the stage for future fiscal negotiations and potential standoffs. McCarthy floats stopgap to prevent government shutdown

Throughout this period, the possibility of a government shutdown was a recurring topic in political discourse, reflecting ongoing tensions over federal spending and budget priorities.

CASE INFO

Case No. 25-2-17456-5sea
Scidpda Bush Hotel vs Shane Lozenich
Judge: Jennifer Petersen
Cause: Unlawful Detainer

SUMMARY

In 2022, I signed a lease for an apartment managed by SCIDpda in Seattle. At the time, I was working at an art studio just down the street, so the location was convenient for me. On August 8, 2022, I was arrested by a group who gained access to my secure building without a warrant or probable cause. The men who arrested me were hiding around the corner on my floor. I spent ten months in jail and was released in May 2023. This situation caused me to lose my job while incarcerated, as my employer could not hold the position open, and I fell behind on rent as a result.

While in jail, I was approached by an organization called Telecare Corp., who offered to pay off the back rent and assist with future payments. They assigned me a case manager in June 2023 to coordinate directly with my building manager and the company that would provide the funds. The case manager requested both an I-9 form and an invoice for the back rent from my building manager. By October 2023, after numerous emails from both myself and the case manager, we were informed that the building manager was unwilling to provide an invoice or accept payment. With no other option, the case was closed, and I continued making monthly payments from gig work.

In addition to the regular rent, I agreed to a payment plan that included rent plus an additional $250 each month. After I believed the balance was paid off, I received a notice stating that several months were still unpaid, with specific amounts listed. I saved all my money order receipts and was able to locate the receipts for those months, which I sent to the manager. She did not respond but instead placed a letter under my door indicating a rent increase. Since this is how leases are renewed with this company, I believed my lease had been renewed. Months later, however, I was unexpectedly served with court paperwork. This came just a few days after I was stopped on the street and interviewed by Kiro News about the safety and security in the neighborhood related to a drug bust. I told them it would be great if there was security at night. On June 3rd my full name and comments were published in the newspaper both in Chinese and English. On June 11th I was served paperwork by an attorney for a unlawful detainer after receiving only one notice between.

From my perspective, the court paperwork may have some so abruptly after seeing my name in the newspaper and connecting it to a manipulated, ancestry majorat in downtown Seattle, which would be in my right to have authority over.

NOTES

- Rent was paid on time prior to my arrest and after my arrest, I made regular monthly payments.
- The money order for what I thought was the remaining balance was returned to me for some reason.

VOICE TO SKULL STATEMENT

Prior to my arrest, I went to the emergency room at Swedish Hospital to report that I was being tortured through electronic harassment. During my visit, hospital staff used a magnet over the top of my head and told me there was a microchip implanted in my skull, then abruptly told me to leave. I still do not understand why they said this or what it meant.

Every day since, I am forced to endure relentless psychological and physical torment through what I believe to be advanced weaponry—so-called "voice-to-skull" technology or psycho-electromagnetic devices. My abusers use remote-directed signals—microwaves, plasma rays, radio frequencies—that connect directly to my skull and nervous system. These signals create constant sounds inside my head: people taunting me, reading aloud anything I read, making vile sexual remarks to destabilize me. Worse, I am forced to hear the horrifying sounds of children crying, being assaulted, and murdered—sounds so graphic and cruel that they push me toward despair.

This constant assault causes anxiety, sleeplessness, loss of concentration, and physical pain: relentless itching, stomach pain, muscle aches, and sudden sharp sensations that feel like targeted attacks. My abusers threaten me daily, urging me to kill myself. They claim they can access my thoughts, my senses—hearing what I hear and seeing what I see—wherever I am. I believe they are using this same technology to facilitate human trafficking and acts of terrorism; I have heard what sound like buses and navy ships exploding from the inside, as if I am forced to witness these horrors through sound alone. I have reached out for help everywhere I could—government agencies, nonprofits, the United Nations, even the church—but I am either ignored or given dismissive replies. I have even been arrested for contacting officials too often and for threatening the mayor and detective out of desperation.

I fear my abusers intend to cause permanent damage or kill me outright. I believe they have used EMP-like attacks on my body, dropping my heart rate in seconds to mimic a heart attack, or targeting my brain with signals that cause my face muscles to sag and my speech to slur, as if inducing a stroke. One night while I slept, I woke to a piercing beep inside my skull and heard someone say, "This is a CSC data breach," followed by the sensation of my chest collapsing and my body dropping weightlessly. A friend of mine was targeted at the same time; he suffered brain damage like a stroke and is now in assisted living, relearning to speak and move.

This technology is invisible, undetectable by standard medical imaging—MRIs and X-rays have shown nothing, nor did jail medical checks. But the damage and terror are real. I am terrified that if this continues, I will be permanently harmed, silenced, or killed.

Since 2020, I have been a victim of what is commonly referred to as targeted individual harassment, a form of persecution involving invasive surveillance technologies and psychological torture. It began with voices that mimicked my next-door neighbors—threats spoken aloud, yet without a visible source. The behavior was completely out of character for them, and I never once saw them act aggressively toward me in person. The voices would emerge primarily at night in my bedroom or while I worked in my backyard art studio.

After several months, the original neighbors were suddenly gone. A new couple moved in—but the harassment continued. Along with the ongoing verbal threats, I began experiencing physical pain in my head and body, like vibrations and sharp pains. It became clear that this was not isolated to one location or group of people. The abuse escalated into full-scale surveillance: the perpetrators appear to have access to my senses. They see through my eyes. They hear what I hear. This intrusion is constant—24 hours a day—and available to anyone connected to this networked technology. It is an unspeakable violation of privacy, dignity, and bodily autonomy.

Every day, I feel as though I am being assaulted—psychologically, emotionally, and spiritually. The trauma has been immense. To compound the horror, I am being forced to hear the voices and pleas of others—people who are being trafficked, raped, and, in many cases, murdered. Many of these victims are children, and somehow they are able to communicate with me. Whether this link is intentionally created by the abuser or an emergent feature of the technology, I do not know. What I do know is that it is an evil, perverse game that no one should be subjected to.

This system is not just abuse—it facilitates terrorism. While I was in jail, I was forced to hear what seemed to be real-time attacks: a bus being blown up, experienced from the perspective of someone inside; ships under siege, with the same horrific intimacy. I do not know how many others are being affected by this, but I know I am not alone. I speak because the silence they rely on is what allows them to continue.

STATEMENT ABOUT MISSING NEIGHBORS

In the neighborhood where I once lived in Seattle, I began to notice that several of my neighbors had gone missing. Concerned for their safety, I reported what I observed. On one occasion, I called the police to request a wellness check at the house next door. I had not seen my neighbor or her children for several months, and one evening I heard what sounded like a young girl's scream being muffled by the noise of a blow dryer.
Not long after, I began experiencing what I can only describe as harassment and electronic torture—tactics that appeared designed to drive me from the neighborhood or discredit me. This campaign of intimidation coincided with my eventual arrest, the filing of a protection order against me, and repeated claims that I was "delusional."

After being forced from the home I was renting, I looked into the situation further. What I discovered was alarming: emergency response logs showed 911 calls to nearly every house across two blocks of the street where I had lived. Soon afterward, those same homes were vacated, sold in rapid succession, and slated for redevelopment. The entire area was rezoned from single-family residences to multi-family condos, and demolition for new construction is now underway.

Around the same time, the county publicly announced it was scrubbing "racist language" from housing deeds—a move positioned as a gesture of equity. But I believe this served another purpose: quietly altering deed records to cover the unlawful transfer of homes taken from missing residents.

From my perspective, what has been presented publicly as urban renewal conceals something much darker: a pattern of disappearances, forced turnover, and possible real estate crime. These homes—and the families who once lived in them—must not be erased. Their stories deserve recognition, and their fates deserve a thorough investigation.

STATEMENT ON CHILD ABUSE

For years I have been subjected to what I can only describe as voice-to-skull torture—forced to hear the sounds of children being trafficked, beaten, raped, and murdered on a near-daily basis. This has left me with both personal experiences of profound horror and a responsibility to speak out.

Beyond what I am forced to hear, the public record is full of evidence of systemic child exploitation. Each year, reports are released documenting widespread trafficking and sexual abuse. Whistleblowers and former officials, such as Robert David Steele, have spoken of this issue from classified perspectives. The Catholic Church continues to acknowledge the thousands of children raped under its watch. Closer to home, more than 100 state employees at a juvenile detention center were identified as convicted sex offenders, the former head of Kitsap County 911 was arrested in a King County sex sting, and even a King County Sheriff's Office employee was exposed as a child molester. Despite this evidence, whenever I have raised my concerns with agencies or departments, I have been ignored, dismissed, or even arrested—told I am "delusional" rather than taken seriously. Yet the abuse of children is real, documented, and ongoing. My experiences compel me to speak, because silence only serves those who exploit the most vulnerable.

STATISTICS:

300 to 500 children: The Port of Seattle cited this range in a 2018 announcement about its efforts to combat human trafficking
300 to 400 children: A 2019 study commissioned by the nonprofit StolenYouth reported this estimate for minors commercially exploited for sex annually in King County.
500 to 700 children: As recently as April 2024, Seattle's Child reported this estimate, referencing data from the King County Prosecuting Attorney's Office, the FBI, and other watch organizations

Statistics from LLCBuddy: Child Abduction "Latest" Statistics in Washington

- In 76% of the missing children homicide cases studied, the child was dead within three hours of the abduction, and in 88.5% of the cases the child was dead within 24 hours.
- Child sex trafficking was probably the cause of 19% of the children who escaped social services' custody and were reported missing to NCMEC in 2021.
- The estimated number of children reported missing is 12,100, while the 95% confidence interval allows for a range between fewer than 100 to 31,000.
- 733 children who were most likely victims of child sex trafficking received recovery planning and safety planning from NCMEC's recovery services team in 2021.

- The average age of the child murder victim in the 74% of missing children homicide cases examined was 11 years old.
- The number of children whom a caretaker missed at some point is estimated at 33,000, with a possible range of 2,000 to 64,000.
- According to a 2002 federal study on missing children, 99.8% of children reported missing were located or returned home alive.
- According to the FBI's latest study, more than 58,000 kids were abducted by non-relatives in one year.
- One in six of the more than 25,000 instances of runaway children that were reported missing to NCMEC in 2021 were probable victims of child sex trafficking.
- According to Carri Gordon, program manager for the Missing and Unidentified Per-sons Unit (MUPU) with Washington State Patrol, there are 1,901 missing persons in Washington State as of May 18, 2020 and of those missing persons, 861 are under the age of 17 and 60 are under the age of 10.

STATEMENT ABOUT TRANSPORTING VICTIMS' REMAINS

These are the suspected locations where the remains of victims were retrieved by helicopter and transported elsewhere. I was forced to audibly witness each act of murder through what I understand to be "voice-to-skull" technology. I had no control over this auditory feed and no means of shutting it off.

Although I could not visually identify the locations, I could clearly hear the brutality of the killings, followed by the retrieval and handling of the remains. In several instances, I heard dismemberment. The removal of the victims' eyes was a recurring detail, though I do not know the reason for this.

After each event, I would hear the sound of helicopters in the background—presumably involved in the transport—followed, typically within an hour, by the same helicopter passing directly over my apartment building. In order to verify these occurrences, I used a publicly available app that tracks real-time air traffic. When I would hear a helicopter via the auditory intrusion, I would simultaneously hear it physically flying over my residence. I would then consult the flight tracking app and visually confirm its direction.
This pattern occurred multiple times and was made easier to track by the limited number of helicopters in the area, most of the other traffic consisting of airplanes.

STATEMENT ON TERRORISM

I have been terrorized through my own devices—subjected to what I know as voice-to-skull (V2K) technology—forced to hear children being trafficked, beaten, raped, and murdered nearly every day. This is not my imagination—it is a deliberate horror inflicted through technological means.

At the same time, the statistics are staggering: globally, terrorism-related deaths surged 11% in 2024, with lone-wolf attacks now accounting for 93% of fatal attacks in the West. In the U.S., domestic terror threats numbered over 2,700, more than double the count of international threats. The National Counterterrorism Center confirms that while jihadist attacks have declined, violent domestic ideologies remain dominant.

Technology plays a central role in enabling terror. The UN warns that terrorists could hijack AI-driven systems—like autonomous vehicles—to carry out remote attacks without physical operatives . Terrorist groups have long exploited ICT (Internet and social media) to recruit, train, plan attacks, and spread extremist content. Modern convergence studies affirm that terrorists are increasingly adopting cybercriminal methods, cryptocurrencies, encrypted communications, and the dark web to fund and coordinate their operations.
I have reported these abuses—these technological violations of my mind and body—to every relevant agency. My emails are ignored; my calls go unanswered. My experience confirms a chilling reality: terror can now be inflicted silently—through devices meant to connect us.

Below are examples of acts of terrorism that took place between 2021-2022 which were facilitated by technology connected to me while I was in jail, such as voice to skull. I was forced to hear each one of these bombings are they happened in real time and spoke to many of them on board just before they were killed.

TRACEROUTES:

The traceroutes and data logs presented here are direct records pulled from my own devices—evidence of unauthorized activity routed through my network. These logs reveal connections to IP addresses both domestic and international, exposing a hidden web of data movement tied to criminal and trafficking operations. My personal devices were exploited as silent tools in these actions, used without consent to facilitate the movement of illicit data and activity. This is the digital fingerprint of a crime in motion.

Data Logs are the records kept by servers, networks, or devices that show activity over time — such as when a computer connected, what IP address it used, and what resources were accessed. In a legal or investigative context, logs serve as the time-stamped trail of evidence, documenting how and when digital activity occurred.

Traceroutes are diagnostic tools that map the path your data takes across the internet. When you send information from your computer to another device, it often passes through multiple servers or “hops.” A traceroute shows each stop along the way, including the IP addresses of intermediate systems. This can reveal how two devices or networks are connected, and in some cases, whether traffic was routed through unexpected locations.

Together, logs and traceroutes help establish digital links. For example, if one IP address repeatedly shows connections to another, or if a traceroute reveals hidden pathways between devices, these findings can be crucial in verifying whether two systems are related, compromised, or operating in tandem. In legal settings, this kind of technical evidence provides verifiable, objective proof that can confirm or challenge claims about who accessed what, from where, and when.
